Porter House
Raymond, Hinds County, Mississippi

---

Narrative Description

The Porter House (previously listed on the National Register as the Porter Family Homestead) is a one-story vernacular Greek Revival galleried cottage with an older detached rear ell. The house was originally located approximately three miles southeast of Raymond, Mississippi. At that location it was listed on the National Register on July 15, 1986 as a part of the Raymond and Vicinity Multiple Resource Area. In 2004 it was moved into the town of Raymond. This nomination is intended to provide documentation of the house as it stands after having been moved and restored, so that it can be listed on the National Register at its new location.

The Porter House was originally located on a rural tract approximately 300 acres in size, approximately three miles southeast of its present site. The house had not been occupied as a full-time residence since 1947, and, by 2003, had deteriorated into a state of substantial disrepair. If left on its original site, the house would undoubtedly fallen into ruin. The present owners acquired the house and determined to move the house to a new site so that it could be preserved.

After receipt of preliminary approval to remove the house to a more suitable location, the house was moved in two pieces to its new site at 233 North Oak Street in Raymond. The roof, porches and second floor walls were removed and structural members were marked to aid in reassembly. The move was completed in mid-October 2004. Then the restoration process was begun. Restoration of the house on its new site was completed in September 2005. The restoration was approved by the National Park Service for the Historic Preservation Tax Credit program.

The new location of the house was, from the 1840s through the time of the Battle of Raymond in 1863, the site of a girls' boarding school referred to as the "Female Academy" or "Methodist Female Seminary." Subsequent occupation had, however, disturbed the site, and there are no appreciable archaeological remains at the site.

The Porter House technically consists of two separate structures that have been linked to function as a single building. The rear porch of the front house is connected to the front porch of the rear structure to for a continuous L-shaped porch.

The front house (ca. 1850), which now faces southeast, rests on brick piers and is 1 ½ story, wood-frame, gable-roofed vernacular Greek Revival planter's cottage with a 5 bay wide full-width inset gallery. It has side gables with brick chimneys and rests on brick piers. The front gallery is supported by six wooden box columns with molded capitals, four of which are original and two are replications replacing missing originals. Indications of the missing columns were present on the boxed porch beam. The front gallery is enclosed by a replicated rail and balustrades replacing the missing originals, the ghost marks of which were found on the original columns. The façade of the house is finished in horizontal tongue-and-groove hand-planed boards with a baseboard. The entrance, located in the front central bay, consists of a single wooden 4-panel 8 foot door flanked by 8 pane sidelights and is a pedimented surround. Pedimented lintels also cap the four front six over six walk-through jib windows.

Porter House

Raymond, Hinds County, Mississippi

The rear of the front house has one large original four-over-four window (in the cabinet room at the north end) and a glassed-in porch across the remainder of the rear façade. The roofline of the rear of the front house has a new shed dormer (with two one-over-one double hung windows) which accommodates the added upstairs bathrooms. The southwest side of the house has two upstairs six over six (replacement) windows flanking a chimney and one large original six-over-six window downstairs. The northeast side of the front structure has two upstairs six-over-six (replacement) windows flanking a chimney and two large original windows downstairs (one six-over-six and one four-over-four).

The original nomination for the National Register of Historic Places states that, "This house is architecturally significant because it is the only example of a one-room deep, ante-bellum, Greek Revival cottage in the surveyed area." The interior of the front structure consists of the one room deep arrangement mentioned in the original nomination. Two large rooms (parlor on the east and dining room on the west) flank a 12' wide center hall. Each of the primary downstairs rooms features a pair of walk-through jib windows on the front, a large secondary side six-over-six window, and a fireplace with original hand-planed pine mantle. Each downstairs room of the front house has the original heart pine floors, original unpainted hand-planed heart pine ceilings and shouldered pediments on the doors and windows. Interior walls in the front house are painted sheetrock over pine planks. Behind the parlor is a cabinet room with two large four-over-four windows. The interior face of the entrance doorway is highlighted by hand fabricated dentil work above the door. On the opposite end of the center hall is an opening flanked by pilasters and topped by a six-paned transom which leads to the glass enclosed rear porch. The interior wall of the glassed porch is original painted horizontal tongue-and-grooved hand planed boards. On one side of the central hall is the completely original stairway, featuring the original stringer, treads and risers, the original single-piece rail from bottom to top and original rectangular balustrades. The upstairs arrangement duplicates that of the main portion of the downstairs. A stairway leads to the upstairs central hall, which is flanked by a bedroom on each side. The wood plank batten door to the east upstairs bedroom is original to the house; the west bedroom door is a replica (utilizing materials from a disassembled batten door located elsewhere in the house), replacing the original which was missing. Each of the bedrooms has a pair of replacement six-over-six windows flanking a fireplace, and a private bath with window which together occupy the shed dormer on the north roof of the front structure. Each bath has antique heart pine flooring not original to the house. The upstairs hall and bedrooms have all original heart pine flooring. The bedroom walls and ceilings are original hand-planed board and batten. Each of the bedrooms has its original fireplace mantle.

The rear ell of the house (ca. 1830) faces northeast and on its southeast end joins the west corner of the front structure. The rear ell is supported by brick piers and original stacked stone piers and is fronted by a gallery porch across the length of the structure. The porch is supported by 6 wooden box columns with molded capitals, three of which are original. The rear structure has side gable peaks featuring a fireplace chimney on each end. The northwest end has a replacement brick chimney resting on the reconstructed original stone foundation; the southeast end features the reconstructed entirely inset stone fireplace. The entrance is a simple federal style five-panel wooden door adjoining a large nine-over-nine window. On each side of the entrance is a pair of four-over-four double hung windows. The southeast end of the rear structure has a four-over-four double hung window and a massive native-stone fireplace chimney.

Porter House

The rear ell probably originated as a pioneer's one-room cabin built at about the time of the founding of the City of Raymond. The original one-room structure was more than likely built in the late 1820s or early 1830s by Samuel Hancock as a "squatter's" cabin constructed with floor joists of logs hewn on only a single side on a stacked stone foundation and hand-rived pine shingle roof. The original foundation stones and log floor joists support the oldest part of the house even today. Over the next decade or so, another room and central hall were added, creating the classic "dogtrot" arrangement. Over time, portions of the rear porch were enclosed to create two additional rooms. This structure, which comprises the rear ell of the house, was renovated in the later part of the 19th century with extensive use of bead board, some of which remains.

Entry into the rear ell is through the striking federal era door into a center hall with refinished 1880s bead board walls, painted 1880s bead board ceiling and replacement antique heart pine floor boards. Opposite the entrance door is another federal door which leads to a screened back porch with its original wide plank wood walls. To the northwest of the central hall is the bedroom, which has replacement wide board wood walls, pine flooring and new board and batten ceiling. The new materials in the bedroom replaced 1880s bead board which had rotted due to exposure to the elements. Off the northwestern end of the bedroom is an added closet. To the southwest of the bedroom is a bathroom. To the southeast of the central hall is the library, the primary focal point of which is the massive stone inset fireplace. The library has painted 1880s bead board walls and ceiling and pine flooring. West of the library is a reconstructed kitchen replacing an earlier one which was deteriorated beyond repair. The kitchen has antique wood flooring, three painted sheetrock walls and one original wide plank wood board wall. Modern appliances and cabinets are found in the kitchen. Two modern one-over-one windows overlook the back yard.

There is one non-contributing structure on the site - a new garage located behind the rear ell approximately 30 feet north of the exterior wall of the added closet. The garage is constructed of wood clapboard and architectural roof shingles with double doors so as to suggest the appearance of a carriage house. Both the front and the rear driveways are gravel.

Porter House
Raymond, Hinds County, Mississippi

Statement of Significance

The Porter House (previously identified as the Porter Family Homestead) was listed on the National Register on July 15, 1986, as a part of the Raymond and Vicinity Multiple Resource Area. In 2004 it was moved into the town of Raymond. This nomination is intended to provide documentation of the house as it stands after having been moved and restored, so that it can be listed on the National Register at its new location. It is locally significant under Criterion C for its architectural character.

The original nomination states that "This house is architecturally significant because it is the only example of a one-room deep, ante-bellum, Greek Revival cottage in the surveyed area." This remains true of the house at its new location within the town of Raymond, approximately three miles from its original site. The house retains its architectural integrity after the move, which was necessary in order to prevent it from falling into ruin, as would have occurred had it remained at its original site. At its new location it has undergone an extensive certified rehabilitation which has restored the front portion of the house and retained much of the historic character of the rear ell, which had been less intact and more deteriorated. The name by which the house is listed is being changed to "Porter House" because the name "Porter Family Homestead" is more appropriately applied to the original landholding than to the relocated house.

The oldest part of the Porter House is the rear ell, which probably originated as a pioneer's one-room cabin built in the late 1820s or early 1830s by Samuel Hancock. Over the next decade or so, another room and central hall were added, creating the classic "dogtrot" arrangement. Over time, portions of the rear porch were enclosed to create two additional rooms. In 1850 William M. Standard acquired the property on which the house stood, and it was likely he who constructed the one and one-half story front house in the then-popular Greek Revival architectural style. From the time of the Civil War into the early years of the twentieth century, the house was owned by the Porter family.

30. Brief statement of the property's history According to Margaret Jackson, the Porter Family lived here during the Civil War. The house was inhabited by members of this family well into the 20th century. Charles S. Spann paid taxes on 160 acres of cleared land (which included this house) as early as 1909, but was not granted title to it by the Porters until 1913. He continued to pay taxes on it until at least 1924.

31. Brief description. If a thorough description has been prepared separately, disregard this section and check here ☐ This 1 1/2 story, 5 bay wide, Greek Revival House with side gable peaks rests on stone piers and stumps. Its full-width, inset gallery has four pillars, but originally had 6. The entrance located in the front central bay is flanked by sidelights and has a pedimented surround. Pedimented lintels also cap the front jib windows. The house features a variety of window styles. The side gable peaks are marked by exterior brick chimneys. To the rear of the house is a 1 story wing constructed in the late 19th century.
