DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Located approximately five miles north of Columbus, Mississippi, on an old dirt road to Aberdeen, Cedar Ridge is a massive two-story Greek Revival mansion built around 1852. Resting on a foundation of brick piers, it is constructed primarily of mortise and tenon frame. The house is covered by clapboard siding and has a low-pitched metal hip-roof. Occupying the central three bays of the five-bay (west elevation) facade is a two-story flat-roof portico with continuous paneled square columns of giant order, which support a full well-proportioned entablature with dentiled cornice. The entablature is carried around the building, unifying the design of the structure. The entrance is contained in a pilastered frontispiece and incorporates casement side lights and transom, which open for increased ventilation of the central hall. A one-bay balcony is centered over the main entrance, which is flanked by six-over-six double-hung windows.

Situated along the north elevation of the house is a one-story extension containing two connecting rooms, each with a corner fireplace, which serve as anterooms for the two major rooms on the north side of the central stair hall. Balancing this extension is a one-story open porch supported by five octagonal columns along the south elevation. A two-story three-bay back stair hall connects the main block of the house to a one-story hip-roof kitchen wing, which contains a dining area in the half nearest the house, a kitchen area at the back, and a central chimney with fireplace openings serving both rooms. A small storage room is attached to either side of the kitchen. Porches, reached by means of french doors, flank the diningroom.

With the exception of the projecting rear pavilion containing the back stairway, the main block of Cedar Ridge's interior is of the standard four-rooms-with-central-hall plan. A straight-run stairway with mahogony rail and turned balusters (now in storage) parallels the south wall of the central hallway. Ceilings on the first floor are $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet high. The two rooms to the south of the main stair hall, apparently intended to be parlors, are separated by sliding pocket doors and were originally equipped with plaster ceiling medallions in a radiating ornamental-leaf design, one of which remains intact. Interior door and window surrounds are in the Greek battered form, and several rooms have jib doors which open onto side porches. Cedar Ridge's twelve original mantel-pieces remain in place; half are embellished with battered Greek motifs and half are of simpler pilastered design. The mantel in the front parlor has its original faux marbre treatment simulating gold-veined black marble. The rear hallway contains a dogleg stairway with pine-paneled stairwell and features faux bois painting in alternating light and dark wood grains.

Of the numerous original outbuildings on the property, only one remains. Located about 120-feet north of the plantation house, the building was originally the plantation smokehouse but was later used as a commissary. Foundations of what are believed to be two slaves cabins, a cook's house, a barn, and a carriage house are still visible on the property

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Cedar Ridge is significant primarily as an outstanding example of the Greek Revival style as it was interpreted in northeastern Mississippi. It is important as well for its peculiar location—on the plantation rather than in town, as was the local custom—and for its unique floor plan and detailing.

The house is located on property purchased by William S. Cox in 1847 (Lowndes Co., Miss., Deed Book 6:393). By 1852 Cox had amassed a plantation sizable enough to warrant a house of generous proportions; it is assumed, therefore, that he began construction on his residence at about that time. During the period of Cedar Ridge's construction it was fashionable among well-to-do planters in the Columbus area to build their residences in town rather than on their isolated plantations. As a result there are many more plantation-type houses today within the city of Columbus than on the sites of suburban and rural plantations. Cedar Ridge, however, like neighboring Waverly, a National Historic Landmark, was constructed on the plantation.

The design of Cedar Ridge is possibly attributable to Vermont-born architect James S. Lull since the residence bears a marked resemblance to three other of his buildings, the Lowndes County Courthouse (1847), Camellia Place (ca. 1847), and Riverview (1847–51). In addition to their classical style, the most significant traits held in common by these four buildings are heavy well-proportioned entablatures and central porticos supported by giant-order columns. The floor plan of the building's main block is the four-rooms-with-central-hall style typical of the period. The joining of a two-story rear stair-hall pavilion with a one-story dining-room/kitchen wing to form a T-plan is unique in the Columbus area. The high quality woodwork and plasterwork of the "public" rooms along with the exceptional "faux bois" treatment of the paneled rear stairway illustrate the excellent craftsmanship employed in Cedar Ridge's construction.

In 1867 the Cox family was forced to sell the house and property for taxes, and after passing through several hands it was purchased by Dr. Jan Uithoven, an emigrant from Holland. On 1900 maps the site of Cedar Ridge appears as a community named "Dutch," a thriving village possessing a post office, church, school, grist mill, saw mill, cotton gin, and store ("History of Proposed Weyerhaeuser Plan Site," Local History Room, Columbus [Miss.] Library. Uithoven may have established in 1907 the first reforestation program in Mississippi when he planted sixty acres across from and north of the house with pine, oak, and other native trees in 1908 (Weyerhaeuser).

Between 1954 and 1956 Cedar Ridge was occupied by a family formerly of the Mennonite faith, giving the house the misnomer of "the Mennonite Place." Weyerhaeuser Paper Company later purchased the land and in 1974 sold the house and ten acres to an individual who agreed to restore the building. After initial stabilization of the
