DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The two and a half story Ford House, located about twenty miles south of Columbia near Sandy Hook, Mississippi, was constructed ca. 1810. The house is approximately fifty feet long and fifty feet wide, including the overhangs. It is a crude but strong structure--a vernacular expression of the raised style of architecture which was popular in the Tower Mississippi Valley.

A first story clay brick base, with concrete floors now covered with sand, forms the foundation for the upper one and a half stories. The latter, constructed of clapboards of heart pine, now ash-gray in color, appears to be hand-cut and The clapboards are put together with wroughthand-dressed. iron nails and wooden pegs. The brick wall is about two feet thick at the ground, tapering slightly in thickness at the top. The four windows on the east side, second floor, are "9 over 9" while all other windows in the house are "3 over 1" of modern design with the exception of the Andrew Jackson room which has a wooden shutter, the only one left in the house. Chimneys on either side of the house provide fireplaces on each floor, with the larger fireplaces on the first floor which were most likely used for cooking. Both the front and the back of the house have overhanging porches at the second floor level which were added sometime after the original construction was completed. The porch on the east side of the house extends the full length of the house and has handmade rails on three sides with a large gate in the center. The porch on the west side is enclosed on either end to provide two rooms, leaving a gallery in the center about twelve feet wide with the same type of rail and gate as the east porch. The areas underneath the overhangs, front and rear, were left The side open creating covered patios with earthen floors. of the house first seen when it is approached from Highway 35 was originally the rear, the house having been built to face the Pearl River to the west. All but two of several old, moss-draped cedar trees which grew on the lawn near the west entrance to the building were destroyed in 1969 by Hurricane The tin roof of the house was replaced after Camille. Hurricane Camille with a composition roof to look like cedar Although there is little or no tangible evidence shakes. there now, it is believed that originally a stockade surrounded the house as a garrison against the Indians.

Hand-hewn sills, approximately ten by twelve inches, around the perimeter and throughout the first floor and two one by three feet brick pillars in the center of the first floor room lend support to the sturdy foundation. Exposed peeled poles approximately six inches in diameter are notched on the ends and flattened on top to provide joists for flooring for the second floor. second floor, secured with wooden pegs into the sills, are exposed underneath the floor ceiling of the first floor, and each stud is marked with a Roman numeral. Doors, approximately forty inches wide and six feet high, are made of one by ten inch planks. What appears to be original hardware remains on some of the doors. Straightrun stairways with turned stair rails and slender balusters rise from the ground on either side to the second floor of six rooms and a foyer.

The flooring and inside walls of the second floor are one by twelve inch heart pine. Each of the rooms at the end of the gallery, west side, are approximately ten by fourteen feet. The west gallery leads into a foyer with a square room to the north and the Andrew Jackson room, about twelve by sixteen feet, to the south of the foyer. The largest room, about fourteen by twenty-four feet runs parallel with the east porch and an adjacent room, measuring about fourteen by sixteen feet, is to the north of this room. Each of these rooms and the attic, which is approximately sixteen by forty feet, has fireplaces.

Located about one hundred yards to the northwest of the house is a barn of heart pine with a hand-hewn cypress roof. On either side of the central wagon-run is a row of animal stalls. Sheds on both sides of the stalls and at the rear of the barn make the overall measurements of the building approximately 54 x 60 feet. The attic or upper story is floored and was used for the storage of hay and other feeds. From the ground at the front of the barn a straightrun stairway rises, parallel to the wall, to a small landing and a large door where entrance is made to the attic.

On October 29, 1816, seventeen delegates from fifteen counties met in convention at the Ford House to consider the question of division of the Mississippi Territory. The primary purpose of the convention, which became known as the Pearl River Convention, was to submit to Congress reasons for non-division of the Mississippi Territory. Among notable delegates to the convention were Cowles Meade, Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, who served as chairman of the convention, Samuel Dale, famous Indian scout, who represented Monroe County and Joseph E. Davis, elder brother and guardian of Jefferson Davis, who along with Meade represented Jefferson County. John Ford was elected secretary of the convention to replace James Phillip who resigned after the convention had begun.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The John Ford House, originally known as the Ford Stockade or Ford's Fort, is located near Sandy Hook in Marion County, Mississippi. John Ford arrived in this section of the Mississippi Territory during the first decade of the nineteenth century, and it is believed that Ford built the house shortly after his arrival.

John Ford, a native of South Carolina, came to what is now Marion County as a Methodist minister and on November 14, 1814, the second Mississippi Methodist Conference assembled at his house. William Winans, a leader in Mississippi Methodism, attended the conference and was re-elected to serve as secretary. One of Ford's minister sons, Thomas, is reported to have "fought the first battles of Methodism in the State capital [Jackson]."

John Ford was active in the defense of the Mississippi Territory during the War of 1812 and the concurrent Creek war of1813, and during this period of time his house served as a refuge for pioneer settlers. The diary entry of November 27, 1814, of one of Andrew Jackson's staff members, Major Howell Tatum, states that Andrew Jackson spent the night of November 27, 1814, at John Ford's house on his way to defend New Orleans. The entry reads: "27th. [November, 1814]...Crossed Pearl river at Fords Ferry and travelled 2 1/2 miles to John Ford's Fort, in all 31 miles and halted for the night...Nov. 28th. Proceeded from Fords about 9 o'clock...."

According to the Territorial Papers, John Ford was postmaster of Fords M^S T^Y in November of 1815. The Ford family reputedly gained the friendship of Tallapoosa, a Choctaw Indian, who kept the Fords informed when his tribe plotted an attack on Ford's Fort and when the tribe became suspicious of Tallapoosa's activities he was allowed to hide in the attic of the Ford House while his tribe made an unsuccessful search of the house for him.

In 1817 John Ford was named a delegate representing Marion County, to the first State Constitutional Convention at Washington, Mississippi, the Territorial capital, and as a delegate signed the Constitution of 1817.

John Ford died in 1826, but his descendants retained ownership of the property until November, 1962, when the Marion County Historical Society obtained possession of about six acres of land on which the house and barn are located. In the meantime the Society has partially restored the house which was opened to the public on June 30, 1963.
