Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Set close to the ground on a small, flat lawn bordered by old cedars and live oaks, the Washington Methodist Church faces north to a nearby frontage road that runs alongside the six-foot high bank of Washington's Main Street, now a four-lane divided road that serves as U. S. Highways 61, 84, and 78.

The three-bay Flemish-bond brick facade of the 42' x 52' building rises from a base band of cement parging to a parapet brick gable kicked out at the eaves. Centered in the gable is the brick arch of a half round opening that is filled with a flat wood panel and is framed, like the openings below, with wood stuctural members whose leading edges are rounded in the manner associated with the Federal style. Below are two ranges of openings with segmentally arched heads. In the upper range, the center window is closed by a flat wood panel bearing an attached neon cross while the outer windows are closed by louvered shutters. In the lower range are three identical doorways, each trimmed with a cut-stone lug sill and with jambs and soffit bearing Federal style molded panels matching in number and trimming those on the doors. Each doorway is closed by a pair of five panel doors separated from a five light transom sash by a transom bar elaborately molded in the delicate, fine profiles associated with the Federal style. On the four-bay sides, the common bond brickwork rises from the cement-parged base to the eaves, where four courses form dentils and a sawtooth cornice. The upper openings are short, nearly-square windows topped by flat arches with flaring brick voussoirs. Round edge wood frames contain pairs of louvered shutters that are hung on parliament hinges with a date range of 1820 - 1860. The lower openings are tall windows topped by segmental arches with plain boards filling the arches. Round edge frames, which trim the twenty-over-fifteen light double-hung sash, are set beneath square edge frames, which trim transom sash, each with small square colored-glass panes surrounding a large clear glass pane. Across the back is a low. one story, 35' x 72', three-by-six bay, cement block addition with paired 3/3 sash windows, overhanging eaves, and exposed rafter ends. The shallow pitched roof extends as a shed up to the back wall of the church, covering all but the segmental arched tops of two windows and the plain gable above. The ends of the addition that extend fifteen feet beyond the church on each side are sheltered by gable roofs. Clapboards cover the exposed side walls beneath the shed roof of the center part of the addition.

The interior of the church is a single space with rough-finish plaster walls, randomwidth wide-board floors, and a beaded-board ceiling angled down from a flat center to hit the walls just above the lower range of windows. A plain baseboard is paralled at the level of the window sills by a four inch, rounded edge, chairrail with a double bead in The the center. flared window jambs are plastered. The narrow, steep ovolo and cockbead associated with the Federal style trims the narrow window frames and the door Separating the freestanding pews from the pulpit is a heavy turned baluster architraves. railing set on a kneeling step. The railing bows forward in front of a low center platform Centered on the back wall is a large wooden frontispiece composed of two for the pulpit. chamfered pilasters supporting an ogee cornice and a plain frieze without architrave. A wainscot of narrow, beaded boards angles up and across the frontispiece between the two plain doors that flank the platform. The rear addition contains classrooms ranged around the outer sides of a large center room, all finished with plywood paneling and wall board, acoustic ceiling tiles, and asphalt floor tiles.

A major remodeling occurred in 1902, according to a 1974 church booklet. These changes probably included the replacement of the flat flaring brick arches with segmental ones, the heightening of the lower windows to allow installation of the colored glass transom sashes, the removal of the interior galleries that attached between the upper and lower windows, the installation of a ceiling that kept the shape of the original but attached to the walls below the upper windows rather than above them, and the installation of the pulpit frontispiece. The rear addition was built in 1946, according to the same source.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Washington Methodist Church is significant for its architectural rarity in Mississippi and for its close association with the history of its community. Though altered, its original configuration is still discernable and significant as one of less than a half dozen Mississippi churches built in the Federal style before the Greek Revival style was introduced to the state. It gains additional importance as the meeting place for people in the town of Washington, which had been the territorial capital and which became an intellectual center for the old Natchez region. Jefferson College particularly utilized the building for its commencement exercises and for lectures during the 1830's by the Jefferson College and Washington Lyceum. Today, it is the only historic church surviving in the village of Washington.

The traditional date of 1828 agrees stylistically with the building and, more importantly, is supported by documentary evidence. On property acquired from Maria Spencer on August 13, 1825, the trustees built the church shortly before May 13, 1828, when the adjoining National Register property, Meadvilla, was sold with reference to the lot where "a Brick Methodist church has been recently erected" and with a map depicting a building labeled "church" on the site of the present church (Deed from John Snodgrass & wife to Benjamin L. C. Wailes, recorded in Deed Book Q, pages 240-242, in the Adams County Courthouse deed records.)
