STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE:

The oldest extant institutional building in Marshall County, the Chalmers Institute has many rich historical associations with the Holly Springs' prominence in education during the nineteenth century. Before the town was incorporated, residents of the settlement raised $22,650 in bonds to build the two-story brick structure, opened in 1837 as the boys' Literary Institute. In 1838, the school was reorganized to include both a preparatory division and a college. It was called the University of Holly Springs - the first school in the state to be called a University. The University closed in 1839 and the property was transferred to the Methodist Church, under whose aegis a law and medical school was established in the building. After this venture failed in 1843, the building remained vacant until 1850, when the Rev. Sam McKinney opened the Chalmers Institute, a school for boys.

CONTINUATION:

It flourished, despite competition from St. Thomas Hall, an academy established by the Rev. Francis Lister Hawkes, until the town was crippled by the Yellow Fever epidemic in 1878. The following year, still another school, the Holly Springs Normal Institute was opened in the building. In the early twentieth century, the old school building was adapted for use as private residence. It is currently undergoing repairs and renovation.

PHYSICAL CONDITION: Repairs and renovation in progress, 1980.
